Compared to other eco-brands, Seventh Generation works out as the second-most expensive, behind Tushies Gel-Free.

Nappy Review says... These nappies have an unusual appearance in that they look just like premium brand nappies, but are unbleached, meaning they have a "brown-paper" look. They are almost completely environmentally-friendly, save for a thin sheet of tissue which is bleached with non-elemental chlorine (chlorine dioxide). Seventh Gen. claims to be working on this. Performance-wise, these nappies are great - just the same as any premium supermarket brand. A good option for Mums willing to pay a premium for environmentally-responsible products. A good option for cloth-users on holidays or travelling. Other Mums say... Where to Buy
